What does this emoji mean

Meaning: A straight pin with a metallic end and a red ball attached on top. The Round Pushpin emoji represents the ‘location’ icon or pin. Hence, signifying a particular place, spot, venue, traveling, and a map. It can also suggest directions and mapping. How and When to Use the Round Pushpin Emoji If you’re texting someone you’re current location, sending the location itself, or even asking someone about theirs, you can use . For example, “I’ve been stuck within these walls the whole of 2020 . What do you want” or “Where are you?? ”. Use in the ‘venue’ section of any post caption or text message to indicate the venue of an event. Since also looks like a dropping or falling pin, you can use while using the famous pin-drop silence quote anywhere. Generally found on virtual maps, may also be used to indicate ‘mapping’ in a metaphorical sense. For instance, “Mapping not only meant for atlas. Mind mapping could be used ”. would also fit perfectly fine even while mentioning the location of a picture, post, repost, etc. Like, “Taken somewhere on the way ”. Other Names Location Pin Location Icon Pin Dropped Pin Mapping Pin Red Pin Red Pushpin Some of the emojis you see and use online and in texts don't mean what you think they do—at least, not what they were originally intended to mean. Some of the misunderstandings, at least in the Western world, are cultural; after all, emoji originated in Japan. Furthermore, all languages evolve over time, and emoji are no exception. As a result, many of us just don't know the original meanings of frequently used emoji. Here are a few of the less obvious. Lifewire / Ashley Nicole DeLeon Want to know more about emoji and their meanings? Head to Emojipedia, which keeps track of all the emoji that are part of the Unicode Standard. What most people think it means: There's no desk, and no indication of information, so this doesn't appear as an information desk person at first glance. In fact, most people call this the "hair flip" emoji because of the position of the girl's hand. It's become trendy to use this in a message when trying to be sassy or cheeky. What it actually means: The girl's hand is positioned to express helpfulness, as if she were asking, "How may I help you?"—exactly as an information desk person would. Screenshot of iOS Emoji What most people think it means: Most people think this suggests a cutesy "oops" expression. People commonly use this emoji to express embarrassment in an amusing way or to emphasize that they made a funny mistake. What it actually means: As its name suggests, this monkey is covering its eyes to "see no evil," as as in the "see no evil, hear no evil, speak no evil" proverb. That's why this one has two other cohorts: one covering its ears and another covering its mouth. Screenshot of iOS Emoji What most people think it means: More often than not, you'll see this used to express ideas like "we're best friends!" and "let's have fun together!" In most cases, it's used to communicate fun and friendship. What it actually means: The women-with-bunny-ears emoji is actually the Japanese version of what Americans call Playboy bunnies: very attractive women with bunny ears. The Google and Microsoft versions of this emoji has just one woman's face with bunny ears. Screenshot of iOS Emoji What most people think it means: This emoji face has two Xs for eyes, and a lot of people interpret that as someone who is dead or dying. The Dizzy Face emoji is almost identical to this one but features no upper teeth. Confused yet? What it actually means: The Astonished Face emoji actually has nothing to do with death—but if you want to express shock and astonishment, use it. On the other hand, if you're dizzy, use the nearly identical Dizzy Face emoji. It might not make a whole lot of sense, but that's how they were intended to be used. Screenshot of iOS Emoji What most people think it means: This one looks like a shooting star and is often used with other space-themed emojis such as the moon, earth, and sun. People also use it to express something magical or special. What it actually means: Believe it or not, this is not a shooting star. Rather, it's meant to convey dizziness. Think back to the cartoons you used to watch in which stars spun around a character's head after he was hit with an anvil or something weighty. Screenshot of iOS Emoji What most people think it means: As with the information-desk-person emoji, people use the nail polish emoji to express sass or an "I'm better/prettier than you" attitude that flaunts beauty. What it actually means: It's just a woman's hand painting her nails pink with polish. Nothing more, nothing less. There's no deep meaning behind it. Screenshot of iOS Emoji What most people think it means: Two open hands can be interpreted in a lot of ways. Sometimes, you'll see this one used to convey the fluttering hand movement common in jazz-dance performances ("jazz hands"). What it actually means: As jazzy as they look, these hands are meant to express openness, as if someone were inviting you to hug. Screenshot of iOS Emoji What most people think it means: In the Western world, this is usually seen as a person praying. People often use it when pleading or to express a desire for something. What it actually means: In Japan, a folded hand gesture says "please" and "thank you," so it's not at all far off from what most people think it means. Some speculate that this emoji was originally a high-five, and some people use it for that. Screenshot of iOS Emoji What most people think it means: There are a lot of food emoji, and this is one of the strangest of the bunch. It looks like a sort of nut to most people. What it actually means: It's actually a roasted sweet potato. Harvested during fall in Japan, they sometimes have purple skin, as seen in this emoji. Screenshot of iOS Emoji What most people think it means: No, this is not a tulip. It's not fire, either. It sure looks like both of those, though. What it means: It's a name badge—the kind on which you write your name and fasten to your shirt. In Western culture, this iOS emoji is considered weirdly shaped for a name badge—but not in Japan, where kindergarteners wear them. Thanks for letting us know! Tell us why!
